Women’s Health NSW is the peak body for the 21 women’s health centres in NSW. The centres are non-governmental, community-based and not for profit. All centres work within the social view of health framework which acknowledges the physical, emotional and mental aspects of health as well as the broader social and economic factors that impact on women’s wellbeing and ability to access services.

We aim to ensure all women and girls are empowered to fulfill their potential within a safe and healthy environment.

The first centres opened in 1974 after concerted lobbying by women involved in the women’s liberation movement. The women’s vision was for women’s health care to be delivered in a gender appropriate, affordable and accessible way that truly met women’s health needs.

In 1982 Women’s Health NSW (then known as the Women’s Health, Information, Resource and Crisis Centres Association) was established to provide support and professional development to the centres and their specialised staff.

By the mid 1980s, women’s health and specialist centres had opened in 23 communities in NSW, many the result of grass-roots advocacy.

Today 21 women’s health centres located across NSW employ 320 staff specialised in women’s health and provide front line services, multi-disciplinary health care and health education totalling more than 162,799 occasions. Many of the centres have enhanced their funded clinics and programs with partnerships to provide additional services. All centres are independently managed and have a feminist philosophical framework which seeks to encourage women to be empowered in their health care and decision-making.

Women’s Health NSW comprises an office in Sydney managed by an elected Board of Management of eight members representative of the rural, metropolitan, outer-metropolitan and specialist centres across NSW and the executive officer.

Women’s Health NSW provides:

- Management and organisational support to member centres
- Continuous Quality Improvement tools and guidance to member centres
- Professional development and training
- State-wide data collection
- Policy development
- Advocacy on women’s health issues and input to government and other public policy and practice

Women’s Health NSW and member centres are proactive on priority health issues affecting women including:

- sexual and gynaecological health
- physical health
- emotional and mental health, eg. depression and anxiety
- impact on health and wellbeing due to disadvantage and social isolation
- the health effects of violence against women

Women’s Health NSW collates data from women’s health centres on 150 health issues affecting women in order to monitor trends and to inform planning and policy development.

Women’s Health NSW works towards achieving

- access and equity in health care for all women
- promotion of the social view of health
- networking opportunities to encourage learning
- research to increase the knowledge base
- advocacy for women experiencing disadvantage

To bring this to fruition, Women’s Health NSW is active within, and representative of, the network of women’s health centres and participates in over 20 working parties, committees and interagencies.
